

The rods and cones of the retina. When light strikes the cells, molecules in the membranous discs change shape. This triggers a cascade of reactions, which allows a nerve impulse to be sent to the optic nerve.